The evil that men do and the men who call it good

Bernard Levin

I have written a great deal already about the horrors in Cambodia and what has happened there. The Cambodian communist movement has been in existence since 1955, but since 1970, it has been growing in strength. We can expect to have to write about the Cambodian communists' activities. Today is not simply to present the evidence of the Cambodian communist movement, but to begin the process of putting into words what has happened in Cambodia, which has so far caused the deaths of hundreds of thousands of people. This is not an attempt to present the evidence of the Cambodian communist movement, but to begin the process of putting into words what has happened in Cambodia, which has so far caused the deaths of hundreds of thousands of people.

The real story is that the Cambodian communist movement has been growing in strength, not simply in numbers, but in the number of men who are willing to commit themselves to the cause of communism. The Cambodian communist movement is not simply a movement of young men, but of men of all ages, from all walks of life, who are willing to commit themselves to the cause of communism. The Cambodian communist movement is not simply a movement of young men, but of men of all ages, from all walks of life, who are willing to commit themselves to the cause of communism.

The Cambodian communist movement is not simply a movement of young men, but of men of all ages, from all walks of life, who are willing to commit themselves to the cause of communism. The Cambodian communist movement is not simply a movement of young men, but of men of all ages, from all walks of life, who are willing to commit themselves to the cause of communism.